Addressing the Crisis

a peer-review journal
inspired by scholar & activist

STUART HALL

Addressing the Crisis is an open source, peer-reviewed journal that takes inspiration from the work of sociologist Stuart Hall. The editor is Deborah Elizabeth Whaley and the co-editor is Mark F. Anderson of the University of Iowa. We are now accepting applications for our editorial board and our research collective.

The journal publishes short, sophisticated essays, videos, digital projects, interviews, dialogues, and art aimed at a wide audience. Authors, activists, and artists engage with the complexity of culture and of everyday life, including the historical and contemporary factors that shape social and political relations. Volume 1 of the journal is available online at <https://ir.uiowa.edu/stuarthall/>.

Editorial board members will hold a PhD or equivalent in their field (MFA for artists). Board members review 1-2 2,000-word or less written submissions, short films, or illustrations a year, using a concise review form. All submissions are pre-screened to insure a productive review process. We aim to have an editorial decision within 3 months.

Members of the research collective agree to three things: their name and affiliation being listed on the journal website, teaching the work of Hall on a regular basis, and integrating or displaying inspiration from the work of Hall into their research, art, performances, and publications.

If you would like to apply for our editorial board, please send an email query with a short biography (500 words or less) and a 3 pages or less CV to addressing-crisis@uiowa.edu by 10.16.20..

If you would like to become a part of our research collective, please send your name, affiliation, and institutional address to
