It having been shown on behalf of Agnes de Valencia, the king's kinswoman, that whereas after the death of Maurices son of Gerald, her husband, she remained on his lands in Ireland, taking her expenses out of the issues thereof, as though he were alive, until, his death having been ascertained, the justiciary of Ireland upon the king's mandate assigned to her the lands and goods which should belong to her together with her expenses for forty days after the announcement of her husband's death, the then barons of the Exchequer considering that she ought not to have anything of the issues of the lands aforesaid after the death of her husband without the king's special mandate, because it was testified before them that she had refused to admit her dower, it was commanded the sheriff of Kildare to levy on her lands and chattels the 289l. 10s. 6d. that she had received from the issues of the lands aforesaid and expended before she had knowledge of the death of her husband, which seems contrary to all right and equity. The king, willing to do her justice, commands Geoffrey de Gyenvill, justiciary of Ireland, to audit the accounts of all receipts, as well by the king's escheator and the executors of her late husband as by herself and her people, of the goods and chattels which were on his lands in Ireland on the day of his death, to allow her her expenses before she had certain knowledge of his death together with the expenses assigned to her for the forty days, and to cause her to have her reasonable share out of the residue of the said goods and chattels, and the executors the other part, and whatever was otherwise seized on either side is to be restored without delay. Further he is to let her have the rents of Michaelmas term next after the death of the said Maurices and the other issues and things which she or her bailiffs can shew that the escheator and the executors aforesaid received in the lands and tenements assigned to her in Munster.
