Whereas the manor of Kynsale, co. Dublin, held by John Comyn, was taken into, and is still in, the king’s hand because John did not come in person or send men to Ireland in accordance with the late ordinance of the great council made for the defence of that land; the king,—for good service rendered by John in his lifetime in the king’s wars in Ireland and elsewhere, and because he granted him licence to absent himself from that land from Easter to Martinmas in the forty-third year, taking for that time the profits of his lands there to relieve himself of the losses which he sustained in the service of the king and Lionel, late duke of Clarence, when he was with the latter in the parts of Lombardy, and John died before Martinmas, at which time he had ordered and arrayed himself to come to Ireland,—has pardoned the said forfeiture and granted the manor to Margaret, Millicent, Joan and Ellen, daughters and heirs of the said John, together with the issues from the said Easter; saving to Anabella, late the wife of John, as much of the manor as she would have had for her dower if the manor had not been forfeited.
