Commission to J. archbishop of York and the king's domestic clerk, Richard de Ravenser, archdeacon of Lincoln, reciting that the king has learned that Adam de Lymbergh, now provost of the church of St. John, Beverley, not understanding the true significance of his title, against the approved rule of true doctrine, converts what is common property into his own property and gluts his own maw by the hunger of others, withdrawing from the canons, clerks, servants and ministers of the church the nourishment of life and applying their daily commons to his own uses, so that some of the beneficed canons, vicars, clerks and ministers are rendered by the poor life they lead less able to exercise divine service in the church; and appointing them, in consideration that the possessions, goods and rents of the provostship were so increased by the industry of the said Richard, while he was provost, that they are now more than sufficient to support the charges of old incumbent thereon and to minister daily and continuous livelihood to the beneficed canons, vicars, clerks and ministers of the church, to summon the said provost to their presence and compel him, even by the withdrawal of ecclesiastical benefices, manors, possessions and rents set aside to support these charges and by any other means, without excuse or fraud to make payment and satisfaction of the daily portion or distribution of bread, ale, flesh, fish and victuals due to the canons, &c., and, whenever he shall refuse to make such distribution, to take the said benefices into their hand and minister the same out of the fruits thereof by one of the parsons of the college of the said church, so that the said benefices shall remain with the said parson until the provost shall have found sufficient security to make the distribution himself without diminution or fraud.
