Whereas of late it was agreed upon between the king and John de Warenna, earl of Surrey, that the earl should enfeoff him in perpetuity of all his lands in the county of Sussex, Wales and elsewhere, which the king was given to understand could be done without prejudice to any one, it was afterwards asserted by Richard, earl of Arundel, who came to the king when he was on his passage, near Iremuth, in the Isle of Wight, that such feoffment would be to his disherison because that in the event of the death of the earl of Surrey without heir of his body, the lands are known to pertain to him, and the king, at his prayer, commanded John de Offord, king's clerk, dean of Lincoln, the chancellor, by writ of privy seal, and afterwards by word of mouth by William de Clynton, earl of Huntingdon, to cause execution of the feoffment to be stayed until further order; now on revolving the matter in the court of his conscience it seems that he ought not to receive such feoffment and in consideration of the service of the petitioner in the war of France, he has granted that the same shall not be carried into execution.
