the earl, his executors or assigns shall receive by tale of the new money as much as he has put in of his old money to make the new; and the king has granted besides that he will cause the laws, compacts and customs belonging to money whether ancient and approved or to be approved to be observed; and therefore he commands the said William to permit this to be done. And because it was lately provided in the presence of the said earl and the treasurer and barons of the Exchequer, and confirmed by oath of the mayor and twenty-four lawful men of the city of London, that of every pound of the old money 10d. be taken, to wit, 6d. for the farm of the king and the earl, and 10d. to the use of the moneyers for loss at the fire to purge the said silver, unless those bringing old money to be changed be willing to purge the same at their own cost and peril; and that of every pound of pure silver there be taken only 6d. for the farm, and of impure silver there be taken to the use of the moneyers so much as shall be rightly lost at the fire in purging the same, unless those bringing the said silver like to purge it at their own cost and peril and for the farm only 6d. as aforesaid, the king commands him to cause this to be established and done.
