To all the faithful of the counties of Cambridge and Huntingdon. The king is astonished and moved to hear that certain of his adversaries are assuming the keeping of the said counties and others the keeping of other counties, without his will or mandate, and presume to remove the king's sheriffs and other bailiffs at their will, prohibiting moreover anyone in the said counties from suing their justice by the king's precept or authority, and doing other things contrary to their fealty due to the king and to the prejudice of the crown. And inasmuch as the king is debtor to the men of the above counties and to all men of the realm in their justice and to show one and all justice and intends to preserve the rights of all, he commands them requesting them, by the fealty and love wherein they are bound to him, not to be intendant to those who presume to assume the king's bailiwicks, whether in the said counties, or in hundreds or elsewhere, without the king's mandate and will, and not to be intendant to them in keeping the said counties or in other things belonging to the king's bailiwicks, but to be intendant to the sheriffs to whom the king has committed the said counties by letters patent, and to the other bailiffs put them by the king, in all things pertaining to the said bailiwicks and to aid them all they can and to behave in such wise that the king shall be bound to them in those things which are to their honour and advantage in the future.
