counsel of the bishops, abbots, priors, earls, barons and all others that six persons, to wit, the bishop of Excestre, the bishop of Ba, the [bishop] elect of Wirecestre, Sir Alan la Zusche, Sir Roger de Suniery, and Sir Robert Walerand, by their oath which they made then, should elect other six who should be least in suspicion, and who have most knowledge and weight, according to whose arrangement one shall be a prelate and the other five knights. And these twelve should swear on the Holy Gospels that they will loyally procure what they understand to be necessary for the reformation of the peace of the land, namely, what belongs to the matter and the estate of the disinherited by occasion of the late war in England, saving the estate of the king and his dignity. And if peradventure the twelve cannot agree in anything which pertains to this business, the aforesaid legate and Sir Henry Dalemaigne shall be called to the said twelve, and whatever that party shall ordain to which the legate and Sir Henry assent together, that shall be firm and established; and if it shall happen that all the twelve are in accord, they shall not say or do anything until they have shown it to the king and the legate and the said Sir Henry, for which thing the king shall call whom he chooses; and whatever the king and the legate and the legate and Sir Henry shall agree upon, or draw up, shall be firm and established. And if the six be in discord in electing the other six, that party shall prevail whom the legate and Sir Henry shall favour. And if any of the twelve die before this matter is terminated, the remainder shall have power to elect others in their place, but so that there shall always be four prelates and eight knights. And the twelve shall have power to make provisions and ordinances until next All Saints. And if those who are called to the king's peace by this ordinance do not come to the peace within forty days, after it has been published in all counties by the king and the legate, they shall not be received afterwards by this ordinance. In witness whereof the aforesaid lords (seigneurs), the king and the legate and Sir Edward the king's son, and the earl of Gloucester have put their seals to this writing. French.
