city, is the king's escheat through the death of the said Robert so that the king can give it to whom he will without injury to anyone.

Whereas in the time of the disturbance had in the realm, the king commanded the bailiffs and good men of the town of Portesmuth that for the security of these parts, they should apply force and diligence for the defence thereof both by land and water against the king's enemies moving about there, and they applied no slight expense in the said defence; the king requests all men, both religious and others, having lands within the liberty of that town, to give a competent subsidy to the said bailiffs and men, for the payment of the said expenses, so that the king may have to commend them, lest through their default he have to apply another remedy.
