Whereas a petition has been presented by John, bishop of St. Asaph, stating that Edward, sometime prince of Wales, granted to Blewellyn, then bishop and his successors, a certain place like a meadow: wodeth, and pasture called Grenewaill, co. Flint, rendering for the same at the exchequer of Chester the yearly farm of 20 marks with the provision that allowance of 12 marks an acre should be made for any parcel of the said pasture which might be destroyed by the sea: and that in consideration of the greater part of the same moor having been so destroyed, and of the cathedral church, of which the said king was founder, having been burned in a rebellion of the Welsh, Henry V, by letters patent dated 5 November in his second year, pardoned Robert, then bishop, the farm for the three years then last past and granted the premises free for the 10 years next following, which last grant was confirmed by the present king's mother for successive terms of 5 and 8 years: the king, considering that the church and manors of the bishopric have not yet been rebuilt, and that little of the said moor has been left by the sea, continues the allowance by way of alms for so long as the said John shall be bishop there.
